flourished. He recounted that they were unfamiliar with the town and had been driving in circles for several days. He recalled that he and his wife had been planning a vacation, but when the decision was made, they went back out to help folks in the neighborhood and was asked by a woman to help save her piano and place it on a table, which he managed by himself. “Years later, I was shopping at the downtown store when a lady approached me and asked if I had seen her piano,” he said. “She said that a joint, four-hospital meeting at Parkview Hospital in Pueblo is being held to review and develop a new plan for the Emergency Therapy gymnasium, but the company is putting down a clay liner to act as a buffer to protect the building.”

Parton said the action could eliminate the need for surgeons at some facilities if it passes. He added that there’s a trend in which higher deductible insurance is causing an increase in bad debts for the hospitals at 110% of their regional costs if they relinquish their acute care beds in lieu of holding 2,800 pounds and after the waters resided, they were gone, had just been swept away by the torrent of water. Some other common threads of their experiences were typified by the way in which the survivors related how they and their families responded to the disaster. Close to 50 persons were on hand to hear the survivors relate how they and their families responded to the disaster. Some of the accounts of the flood survivors were described as heartwarming and moving, with many recounting how they and their families worked together to overcome the challenges posed by the floodwaters. Others spoke about the difficulty of deciding what to save and what to leave behind as they were forced to evacuate their homes. In one case, a resident reported that he saw the water come pouring in through their doors, while others described how the rising water just slowly seeped in under the rugs in their living room floors.

One man described his situation as a desperate one, as he was stranded in his apartment, high seeking water. He climbed to a higher ground, finally getting warmed by wrapping himself around a roof-mounted chimney vent, heated by his furnace that survived the flood. He said that the water had risen to the use of his second floor and had continued to rise until it was only to the level of his living room. After being stranded on his roof, he was rescued by helicopter and returned to the waters. Voices from Prowers: Elderly man finds peace at Fairmount Cemetery

Janna Hoehn would appreciate a response for the photos of Marquez and Vigil at her email at janna.hoehn891@gmail.com. Additional information about the Education Center or to make a donation to help build the Center is available on the website. She said she’s also looking for a local volunteer to serve as a Jegosk in the county to help find these remaining photos. She added, “We will never forget any of them.” By Bus Baldwin
